Golovko N. D. Davidson, Instrumentalism and Need for Reference.

Davidson's position on the need of an explanatory correspondence notion of truth is always interesting primarily because of its reliance to the central problems of semantic realism. Davidson gives truth the central role in semantics, he uses Tarski-style truth theory and deflationary notion of truth but deny any place to theory of reference. The paper shows that Davidson's position may be seen as unacceptable instrumentalism about reference. So his conception is simple not interesting for those who interested in the development of semantic realism.

Key words: D. Davidson, Principle of Charity, Principle of Rationality, semantics without reference.

Karpovich V.N. The concept of truth and logical ontology.

Philosophers of various persuasions were concerned to investigate the ontology of truth. That is, they were interested in the extent to which one needed to assume the existence of entities serving some role in accounting for the truth of sentences. Certain of these entities were conceived as the bearers of the properties of truth and falsehood. But instead of, or in addition to, truth-bearers, one must assume the existence of certain entities in virtue of which sentences and/or propositions are true. Any entities which are candidates for this role are called truth-makers. The paper argues that the ontology of truth can be conceived as situational in the sense that truth-makers are specially and temporally determined.

Key words: logic, ontology, truth, concept, proposition, truth-bearers, truth-makers, situation.
