PREFACE

It is usual for visitors who commit to print their impressions of a new country, the information they have gathered, and the judgments they have formed, to offer apologies for publication, in the hope of averting, in some measure, the hostility naturally felt by those invited to read a book of travel written by one who cannot claim a thorough knowledge of the land of which he writes. Such apology is, however, both futile and unwarranted. It is futile because the dwellers in the foreign country, seldom content with the appraisal of a stranger, are not deterred by such formal apology from detecting a "tone of superiority" in a visitor who presumes to found judgments or even
